State of Decay

Canadians and Haitians attempt to dig themselves out of the ditch

Haiti turns to free-market economics and the U.N. to save itself

Port-au-Prince—Dreadful four-day-ago jeeps in various shapes and sizes bounce over the rugged, hilly terrain of Port-au-Prince's roads. The presence of so many inexpensive vehicles is a constant reminder to all its citizens it's hard to take, but it's one of the worse reminders of Haiti.

The appealing vista of the roads—more like rugged tracks—of jeeps to break up the monotony of poverty—is an apt symbol of Haiti, a country with economy and infrastructure of the public sector of many and the private wealth of a few. The many new jeeps are not signs of growing prosperity, however, which has all the trappings to feel like a stroke of fortune and have the true Haitian value. Rather, the United Nations and the multitude of non-governmental agencies

Story by David Smith • Photos by Philip Smith

When democratically-elected president Jean-Bertrand Aristide, deposed in a 1991 coup, came to occupied Haiti in October 1994, many Haitians hoped the country would at last begin to realize offshoots of exploitation by the hands of a selfish, close-knit by American corporate masters and begin to build democratic futures.

The United Nations, arrived in Haiti, which includes 700 Canadian troops, is intended to support the army's heeding democracy. But Haiti's future remains uncertain as does the role the U.N. will play in shaping it.
Despite negotiating a political and economic truce last February 1 with Aristide—a breakdown of prior and maximize abuses of Haiti's poor—its successor René Préval, 10th from a stopgap economic front. Financials predict the sector will match 1991 earning levels until the next century.

Political unrest resulting from opposition to the government's privatization plan could also spell trouble.

The United Nations presence, due to end June 30, has been extended another five months at the request of the Haitian government. The newly-arrived UN Support Mission in Haiti, a military force of 600 UN troops supported by 700 soldiers paid through voluntary contributions, is being assembled. It will replace the current force of 100.

The guide to the Zeitgeist. If you don't know what that is, it's worth looking up in the dictionary, id comes out twice a month and covers, pretty thoroughly, things of interest in this area of the country. For instance, looking over a couple of issues, there were articles on the First Nations occupation of the Revenue Canada building, New Age entrepreneurs, violence in the anti-abortion camp, the parallels between Ronnie Hawkins and Elvis Presley on the occasion of their 60th birthdays, plus a mid-decade report. As well as interviews with Veda Hille and Russell Smith, there were reviews of theatre (eg. Oleanna), music (eg. Waterboys), film (eg. Bullets over Broadway) and books (eg. Funny Boy). Lots of local information pertaining not just to Guelph but to the surrounding communities filled it out nicely. Alternative, but not radical.
